Trump Wants No Due Process At U.S. Border

constitutional Woes After a Fiery Attack

By KEITH RODGERS and SHERRY GAY STOLBERG

President Trump unloaded an aggressive attack Sunday on an antiterrorism strategy and criminal justice system that fandoms him, saying they "whisper in his ear" and "can't be seen but heard immediately without some prior intervention." The attacks were not unexpected, given the ongoing feud between Trump and the Justice Department.

"We cannot allow all of these elements of law and order to be left to our enemies," Trump tweeted while on the way to a fundraiser in Miami. "When somebody comes in, we must immediately put a ban on "Cool Cat," bring them back from other places they may have gone." Trump continued to use the term "Cool Cat" to describe the Justice Department.

The pair of tweets was a continuation of a series of attacks on the Justice Department by Trump. The first tweet was a response to a story in the New York Times that detailed how the Justice Department had been investigating the Trump campaign for possible Russian interference in the 2016 election.

Trump has frequently accused the Justice Department of not being aggressive enough in pursuing cases against individuals and organizations suspected of violating campaign finance laws.

The New York Times article, which was written by the Times' Washington bureau chief, announced that the Justice Department had been investigating the Trump campaign for at least a year and had not yet taken any formal action.

Trump's tweets on Sunday were similar to previous ones in which he has accused the Justice Department of being too soft on Russians and other foreigners involved in the 2016 election.

Trump has previously threatened to shut down the Justice Department if he does not get the investigations he wants. He has also said that the Justice Department is "totally out to help the Democrats."